It might be hard to imagine that it's already November in New York City but the weather is still pleasant, which means it's still a great time for new outdoor art installations to hit the streets. For the winter months, we're also including some select indoor art installations and exhibitions worthy of note to our architecturally-discerning readers.

This month, across all five boroughs of New York City, you will find street art murals, sculptural installations, video art, plus groundbreaking and newsworthy exhibitions on Andy Warhol at the Whitney Museum, M.C. Escher, and the return of holiday favorites like the New York Botanical Garden Train Show and the Thanksgiving Parade.

18. OY-YO at Brooklyn Museum

Deborah Kass' OY-YO sculpture made a splash when it debuted in Brooklyn Bridge Park in 2015. Meant to be seen in both ways, it serves as a welcome point between different cultures. OY-YO spent some time in Williamsburg after Dumbo, and has just arrived at the Brooklyn Museum, joining other works in the Something to Say exhibition of text-based works by Brooklyn-based artists Brooklyn Hi-Art! Machine, Kameelah Janan Rasheed, and Hank Willis Thomas.

According to the press release, "In Prospect Heights and neighboring Crown Heights, OY/YO takes on new meaning, as it speaks to the longstanding, complex, and ever-evolving social dynamics between Black, Latinx, and Jewish communities in the neighborhood. At the Brooklyn Museum, OY/YO will function as a new greeting, welcoming visitors to the museum connecting to a diverse audience, while also saying "hey" to locals.

OY-YO will be on view at Brooklyn Museum until June 30th, 2019.
