Okay, it's gotten colder, so staying indoors is the natural thing to do. But slurping even the best ramen in NYC and binge-watching your favorite shows on Netflix will only get you so far before cabin fever sets in. You're going to have to get out sooner or later, so why not take in a little art viewing on your way to wherever you're going? We have ten outdoor projects up around the city you can stop by and admire during the winter months. There will be plenty of sunny and mild days to go see them—but only if you're a wuss; hardcore New York art lovers aren't afraid to brave the snow and freezing temperatures. Either way, these public artworks, listed chronologically by end date, are worth checking out.
